The Turbotville Train Station has taken quite a journey in its 125 years of existence. Originally built in 1886 by the Wilkes-Barre & Western Railway Company, it was used for both freight and passenger service. When passenger service ended to Turbotville around 1937, the station continued to be used for freight for a short time after. In 1964, under the ownership of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, the station was donated to Harry L. Magee of Bloomsburg, PA, it was dismantled wall by wall and transported 25 miles to his new Magee Transportation Museum. The museum was in operation until Hurricane Agnes flooded it in June 1972. By October, four months later, Harry L. Magee died. The museum was closed and parted out, but the buildings remained on the property when it was sold. This station is one of only two examples left from the entire rail line from 1886. On October 1, 2010, the Turbotville Borough Heritage Society purchased the station and will be relocating it back to its original home, in Turbotville, PA, in 2011 in time to mark the stations 125th Anniversary.
